EDUCATION

Dr. Krassin was exposed to eye care at an early age when he and his brother would go to their grandfather's Optometry clinic. With the clinic built into his grandparent's home, Dr. Krassin had many opportunities to learn about vision, refraction, and what equipment could be touched and what things could not be touched. After finishing undergraduate studies in Nebraska and graduating Magna Cum Laude, he went to California for medical school. It was there that he was exposed to ophthalmic surgery and found his true passion. He graduated from Loma Linda University Medical School and immediately began training in the ophthalmology residency program at Loma Linda University. He received extensive training in refractive surgery at the Naval Medical Center in San Diego, California, and graduated from residency ranked 9th in the country for refractive surgery volume as a primary resident surgeon.
